History Of Richmond

Richmond began as a military settlement and today its veterans and members of the Royal Canadian Legion, Branch 625 continue to contribute to the well being of its citizens through community services and involvement.

Its men and women served valiantly in World Wars I and II. In honour of those who had served their country in war, the South Carleton Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion unveiled an honour roll in the Memorial Community Center in 1950. That building has since been demolished.

History Of The Richmond Legion

In 1973 Branch 625 of the Royal Canadian Legion, Richmond, received its charter. Originally there were 27 members. Members of the first Executive and Committee were:

Richmond Cenotaph

At the end of the Second World War, ex-servicemen returning to Richmond established a Patriotic Trust Fund, the purpose of which was to erect a cenotaph. However, this fund lay dormant and was finally taken over by the Richmond Legion when it was formed in 1973.

In 1976, the Legion attempted to build a cenotaph but had to abandon the idea. However, with the development of the Richmond Memorial Park by the Township of Goulbourn in 1988, the dream to commemorate those who had served during war, was realized. On November 6, 1988, the former Minister of Defence, the Rt.-Hon. George Hees formally unveiled the new monument. The following November 11th, more than 400 people attended the first Remembrance Day service at the cenotaph.

Fallen... Not Forgotten

The centre piece of the garden in front of the legion hall is the granite cross and accompanying engraved tablet. The engraved words "Fallen Not Forgotten" represents not just the fallen veterans that are honoured and remembered by legions world wide, but for the Richmond Legion it also invokes memories of the original monument at their cenotaph, which was destroyed by a micro-burst in 1998.

The cenotaph itself is located in the Richmond Memorial Park at the corner of Perth & McBean St, across from the Richmond Bakery. The monument at the cenotaph was rebuilt and the top of the damaged monument was taken to the legion hall and used to form the front of the garden wall. Both the cross and the engraving are readily visible from the street and is a visible reminder of our fallen.
